

EASIA 237 Pansori Unit 3.mp4

Welcome back, everybody. This is the third and final lecture in our module on pansori in Korea. Today we're going to be talking about contemporary issues; that is, the sort of preservation and innovation of the form in the 20th and 21st centuries. So today's lecture is going to cover a few different topics. First, as usual, I'll give a brief overview of the resources associated with this unit of the module. If you haven't had a chance to look at those yet, this is a good opportunity to see a bit more about what we'll be talking about today and how all of the different components relate to what I'll focus on in this lecture. This is going to include a somewhat longer introduction to the reading assigned for today.

What I'll be doing here is introducing the article itself and then talking through a couple of different ways to think about reading and note-taking strategy for this kind of writing that is an academic research article from a journal that has a pretty specific topic that's going to advance a fairly specific argument about that. So this approach is useful for this article. I think the article is relatively straightforward. This is also a technique that you can use for more complex or harder-to-follow arguments. So I think it'll be useful for getting more out of this article, but also useful for other readings we'll do throughout the rest of the class, and I'm sure in other courses as well. Then I'll get into a bit more expansion on some of the topics addressed in that article, mostly reiterating and clarifying a few key points made there.

I'll be sticking pretty close to what the author of that article covers in this case because I think this fits in really well with where we are in this module in the class. So first, we'll be talking about the 20th century, reviewing some basic definitions and themes over the course of the 1900s. To put it quickly, talking about what's been going on in the early 1900s up until the 1990s or so, and then moving on to discuss the past couple of decades. Now you might want to note the publication date of the article. There's certainly more that's happened since this article was written. One of our resources will bring us a bit closer to the present, and something to consider as one possible resolution to some of lingering questions that are raised at the end of this article.

I'm going to focus on a particularly interesting part of this article that I think fits really well with the themes of this course; that is the section towards the end of this article where she talks about the authenticity debate. We'll sort of summarize the different positions in that debate, clarify what it is they're actually arguing, what they're arguing against, and then think about what we should do with a debate like this. Right? Is it something that we need to solve? Do we need to decide who's right or who's wrong? What else can thinking about these kinds of contrasts and perspectives and opinions help us to understand about culture and society in the present? I'll then have a short introduction to the quiz and assignment for this part of the unit, which, if you're keeping track, we're in the final unit of the module.

So, this means in addition to having a unit quiz, we'll also have a module quiz to wrap up this one before we move on to the next. Then, I'll also have a bit to say about the assignment, which is really an opportunity for you to think through the different issues at stake in the so-called authenticity debate and hopefully apply them to a sort of parallel or complementary example, as we're often doing in these kinds of assignments. That's probably somewhat predictable by now. So just to sort of help you pace things, if you haven't looked at the resources carefully yet, I recommend watching up until at least the end of slide four, right? to help you sort of think about what sequence you might want to go through those resources in and how to approach the reading, then returning and going through the rest of it again, perhaps breaking things up occasionally in a way that makes sense for your schedule.

So, to move on, let's talk about our resources for this unit of the All of these have to do with very recent history. There's a couple of videos I'd like you to and then, of course, an academic research article that I'll be spending most of our time discussing today. The videos I've chosen, I think, really complement the article well, and in fact, one of them is just a video. example of something that Om, the author of the article, talks about in pretty great detail and provides a sort of translated excerpt from. So this is a, you know, unfortunately not great quality kind of handheld video camera recording of one example of what we could call like outsider or marginal pansori by Bakteo. It's called Star Wars.

It's adapted actually from, you know, characters and plot details from a computer game called StarCraft. Used to be incredibly popular. Forgive me, I'm not sure if it still is. Perhaps some of you know about it. It's okay if not. And I've chosen this just because Om talks about it pretty directly. So she gives a sort of vivid picture of what the text and content of the performance is like, but of course we know these are, you know, sung performances. They happen in real places with a real audience. So I think watching the video will give you a chance to see the really kind of, you know, engaging performance of the performer, but also the sort of atmosphere.

Perhaps a more sort of casual, certainly family-friendly; you can see there's lots of children in the definitely like a bit more laid back than what we might expect from a performance of, you know, a so-called traditional ancient performing art style, right? This is kind of what we'll be talking about throughout the lecture today. Not just the text of the performance, but everything about how this fits into the sort of community and culture of pansori in general. The next one is not something that Om talks about in her article, but it is something that I think really helps tie a lot of things together in this module. I think the connections that we can make to general points that are raised in the article are fairly clear.

This is another example of, you know, 21st century new pansori, adapted from a larger variety of source materials. This one is based on pretty popular, you know, novel, sort of popular fiction. for young readers The Little Prince but of course this was written and performed after the article was so this is why it's not discussed in the article. Nevertheless, I think we can sort of fit it in very precisely within the schema of, you know, 21st-century pansori that Om provides in this article. The reason why I think this helps to tie things together is that the performer is actually the same person that we watched videos by way back in unit one of this module, who's giving us an introduction to what we might think of as kind of traditional or formal pansori.

Right, so this is someone who's both doing these kind of really new innovative styles of performance adapted from, you know, certainly not traditional Korean folklore or anything like this; but this is also someone who certainly we can see has an interest in, you know, educating people and performing and, like, engaging with this more sort of quote unquote traditional version of pansori. So another thing to consider is that those other performances, right, we sort of use those in unit one to give us a general sense of, you know, what is pansori in general, kind of outside of historical context; what are the sort of basic components of a performance? But now we can kind of reflect back on those videos. as another example of pansori in the 21st, right?

Both the kind of international leaning perspective of this being sort of hosted by the Korean Cultural Center in Los Angeles, having fairly well put together English subtitles and certainly designed to educate people that might not know that much about, you know, anything that has to do with pansori. We can kind of place these alongside other examples of pansori performance in the 21st century. A kind of warning about these is that these two videos, the one adapted from Starcraft and the one adapted from The Little Prince, unfortunately, they don't have sort of official English. translation Again we might sort of contrast these videos that are produced specifically for an international audience versus those that are not necessarily meant to reach audiences outside of Korea.

So there's kind of, you know, an advantage and a disadvantage to not having access to those subtitles for those of us who don't, you know, understand Korean, especially not, you know, sung Korean in the kind of dialect that these pieces may be recited in. So unfortunately, we don't get to, you know, hear the plot, hear the story necessarily, but it does allow us to focus on everything else, right? So in the case of the Starcraft pansori we do have that short excerpt to give you a kind of feel for what the text is like, and we can kind of set that aside when we watch the performance and think about everything else we see going on in the room, from the costume the performer is wearing, to the kind of gestures that he performs, to the interaction between audience and performer.

All of these different things we might have a kind of heightened awareness of if we're sort of relieved of having to understand the words that are being spoken. Again, you know, for those of us who can't do that, you know you're probably aware of this feature. These are just YouTube videos. If you Like you can play with the automatic transcription and subtitle translation setting. You might be able to get something kind of intelligible out of this, but please don't trust this as a sort of official authoritative translation of anything that's happening in the room when these things are going on. But you know that option is there if you really need to know speaking wise in either of those videos.

So what I recommend doing actually is working your way through the reading first and then either returning to those videos or even honestly just watching them for the first time after you've already looked at this article. I think once you do, you'll have a much clearer idea of what to expect out of both of those videos. And in fact, since the Little Prince excerpt is not something that the author discusses in her article, I think it's a good opportunity to make some connections of your own and perhaps take some notes about how you think that video relates back to some of the that are raised in the But what we'll be looking at for the reading is an article by a scholar of musicology and the history of pansori and Korean performance and popular culture in general called New Pansori in 21st Century Korea.

The author's name is Hyekyong Ohm, also a professor. at the University of This is a good example of an academic journal article. So that is, this is a sort of standalone piece of research that's published independently of anything else in the issue of the journal that it's found in, but which we might expect to have some kind of connection to the general theme or topic of this entire periodical publication, likely published at least once a year, if not more. And so this is in distinction to other examples that we've read in this and other units of the class, which might come from edited volumes, in which case, you know, every chapter is written by a different person, but the chapters.

all kinds of fit together in relation to a fairly narrow theme or like a chapter in a book where the whole book is all written by one person, and they're kind of gradually developing a more complex argument over the course of every chapter. So, because this is a kind of standalone piece of research, it's worth talking a little bit more about how to approach it, especially in the context of a class like this one. So, let's talk a little bit more about that reading. I mentioned that this is an article in a journal, as is conventional for this kind of This is a self-contained piece of You don't need to read anything else in this journal to. Understand what the author is saying in that.

But I think it's helpful for us to do a little bit of pre-reading preparation, thinking both about the title of the article itself, of course, always important, but then also the title of the journal it's published in. Because what this is going to do is really give us a sense of who the intended audience for an article like this is. When scholars think about where they're going to publish their research, they take this very seriously and they try to find periodicals, venues to publish their research that are going to reach an appropriate audience. And this is also going to influence. the way they write this case because this comes from a journal called Asian Theatre Journal, it immediately tells us who the audience is.

It's something that's being written not just for people who are very narrowly also specializing in the study of Pansori like this scholar is, but it's also not necessarily being written for a very general kind of non-region specific periodical that might focus on performing arts all over the we can say okay we might expect that the author is going to tell us those kinds of regionally specific details that are particular to Korean culture, history and performing arts, but also that it's going to be, you know, she's sort of expecting to reach people that probably know something about some other aspect of performing arts in this might help you understand there's actually a very particular point towards the end of the article where she draws some connections between other theatrical traditions in other parts of Asia.

And this is where you can really see the author saying, well, this is what's going on in; here's how we might compare it to what's going on in China, in Japan, and other parts of, again, kind of targeting that particular audience that she wants to reach. For our purposes, this is pretty useful. If you Haven't, this is one article where I think it's actually worth reading some of the footnotes, especially for issues related to, like, 20th century Korea. We don't have a lot of opportunity in this class; we move very quickly, covering a bunch of different topics. I found that the footnotes here give us a really good kind of crash course in Korean history that will help us to understand how some of those broader, like, political and social movements then influence what's going on in the performing arts sphere.

And again, these might not be there in an article that was only about, or that was only expected to be read by other specialists. In Korean culture and history, the author might say, well, everybody probably already knows these things, so I don't really need to explain these kinds of political movements or social movements. But in this case, she does take the time, mostly in the footnotes, to help clarify some of those names and dates and things like that. And so, in this case, you know, other cases may not be as practical to really scrutinize the footnotes. Here, I do think it's worth it to at least have a glance if you encounter a reference to some period of history that doesn't quite make sense to you.

Another thing that we can do is try to do a sort of close reading. of the title of the article. In this case, it might involve thinking about the definition of a sort of word. Perhaps this is a word you've seen before: dialectic; perhaps it isn't. The kind of short version of this is that this is a kind of scholarly, technical term that's used in a lot of different contexts. There are very sort of disciplinarily precise ways of using it if we're talking about, you know, philosophy or history or things like this. I don't necessarily think that's the case here. I do think it is still useful to really think about what this word means and how we should interpret the conclusions to this article in light of. the use of the word dialectic, and the sort of simple definition that I think makes the most sense for this article is that yes, we're talking about some kind of discussion or debate, you know, a conversation of sorts between two sides that don't necessarily agree with one another. But the important thing about calling this a dialectic instead of calling it, you know, a debate or a discussion, is what's often implied in this word is an argument in which the kind of goal or the end result, regardless of what the goals of the two sides were, is not saying, oh, one side is right and the other side is wrong, in which case we have, you know, a victor. who establishes like this is the authority. This is the sort of solution to this argument.

And that opposing side is incorrect. Instead, dialectic is often going to refer to these cases in which the two sides might disagree with one another. But the result is a kind of third possibility, right? It's not going to be either side A or side B is the right one, leaving their opponent totally, you know, sort of contribute to some kind of new third position. In this case, I think that's even kind of an oversimplification of, you know, what has played out in history. It's not it's not one of these cases where the debate sort of unfolds formally. the two sides mutually agree that this new third position is the correct one. Right? This is sort of getting, you know, towards topics we'll talk about when we come to the end of the lecture.

I don't want you to think that the purpose of presenting these two sides is to say, oh, side A is correct and side B is incorrect. Or even to say, you know, both A and B are wrong, but this new, like, third possibility is right. What we're talking about is a kind of ongoing contrast in perspectives and values in which there are possibilities for sort of new perspectives too. But we're not talking about something so simplistic as, like, you know, once one side has been defeated. Everybody just sort of mutually decides to move on. So this is maybe I'm talking a bit too, like theoretically and generally about this. But I do think, you know, the appearance of a word like dialectic in an article's title is worth thinking about a little bit, right?

So this is sort of what I'm talking about. I'll probably I've probably have already used this word many times in different units and modules. It's something that I am a big proponent of. We can call it simply active reading, and we can define it very simply as creating questions that you yourself want to find the answers to in everything that you read. rather than just kind of passively looking at the article and expecting the information to just kind of, you know, find its way naturally into your brain. This does require a bit of preparation, though, right? And in order for it to be useful, you need to think of good questions to ask in order to, like, have questions that you can keep in mind that you're trying to answer as you read.

So, keeping in mind, you know, what I've suggested about the use of the word 'dialectic' in this title, one question we might keep in, we might think about is, you know, we know that this is some kind of generative debate between two sides. What is tradition in this case? What is modernity in this case? Who represents both of those sides in practical terms, right? Tradition and modernity obviously are abstract concepts. They can't debate with one another. So who are the proponents of each? How are these coming in contact with one another? And then, if we're thinking about this again as a dialectic, right? Something that's going to generate new possibilities, generate the word that's often used to synthesize, right? Sort of combine elements of those two positions to create something new.

Well, what is the resolution? Again, keeping in mind that this is not a resolution that we should expect. is going to satisfy everybody. It's just a third possibility that might then enter into the debate in other ways. So, you know, what does tradition mean in this context? What does modernity mean in this? Who represents both? And what is it that's creative about all of this? This might seem really rudimentary, right? But the purpose of doing this is not to think of a really brilliant question. It's just to come up with something, right? Something that you can keep in mind as you look at the article and then use this to sort of guide your reading as you progress through it. So we might be able to go into a little bit more depth beyond just scrutinizing.

individual words that appear in the We might glance through and note that OK, obviously, the 21st century is important to this. But even just looking at the section subheadings, we can see very clearly that a pretty significant amount of this article is about things we've already covered in earlier units introducing origins of Pansori and the nature of those performances before the 20th century. And it also has a fairly lengthy section on Pansori in the 20th century. For our purposes, I think it's easy to understand why I'm asking you to read this article. This gives us a good review of what we covered in unit one. It covers some Things that we're moving through pretty quickly to get to the 21st century in a fairly concise and informative way.

But we should keep in mind that this is not just an article that's written to provide general information about the history of Pansori in the 20th and 21st centuries. This is an article that's specifically about the argument that Om is making about this kind of debate or conflict between tradition and modernity. So how do all of these things that lead up to these sections of the article that seem to address it more directly. Why are they there? What purpose do they serve? This is a question to keep in mind as you read this. Then the last thing to do is try to put all of this together. We've kind of come up with some sort of basic questions that are going to help inspire us to pay attention as we read through the.

But then, of course, the other thing we have to do is figure out, well, after all, what is the point that the author is making in this? What's the In this case, I think the last paragraph of the spoiler alert, I guess, really gives us a fairly clear perspective on the. But it's worth taking some time to think about. In other cases, it might not be articulated so. So this is about sort of reflecting on what you've read and thinking about how all those components of the article sort of work together to, you know, allow the author to defend their thesis. Then the final thing to ask is, what does this have to do with this class? Right, I mentioned one of the reasons fairly directly.

I think this is helpful just as a kind of repository of information about Pansori in the 20th and 21st century, but I think this argument is also very relevant to other topics that we are addressing, not just in this unit or module, but throughout the entire course. And so, this is something that's worth pondering every time you complete one of these, you know, kind of assigned reading sources. So, in this case this might be enough that might give us enough sort of direction and inspiration to work through the article very carefully. I do want to recommend another strategy, or maybe another layer of depth to this strategy. It may be helpful for this article, but I also think this is a good, very straightforward way to demo this process that you can use, perhaps in other cases.

So perhaps you'll find this helpful for this article. I think you'll certainly find it helpful for something in the And this is what I call creating a reverse outline. It's another way of coming up with questions that you can ask as you read through a chapter or an article, but it's a way to ask more sort of precise questions, kind of similar to the way that we did a sort of close reading of the title to come up with some questions. In this case, you'll want to look through the article and see like subtitles, right? Those kind of boldface headings that occur every few pages throughout the article. And then after you've sort of written questions, and then read through the appropriate section, and then come up with an answer to those questions.

And for this to work best, really, you should write down the questions and then also write down your answers. It's really like a note-taking strategy, right? It's about sort of condensing and summarizing the key points of each section into a few, like, easier-to-remember phrases or bullet points or something like this. But then, of course, there's a reflection part of this too, where then you have to think, okay, I've kind of condensed all of this information into a few useful points. Now, what I need to do is think about the big picture, right? How does this relate back to the premise of the article itself? So the reason why I don't know that this is going to be really mind-blowing in the case of this article is because actually the section subheadings, in a way, are already questions, right?

So We could say, well, the answer that I'll come up with after reading this is, 'What is pansori?'

Right? Very straightforward. Don't need to think too much about that. But we can again scrutinize some of the other terms that are used here and maybe use this as a sort of prompt for some concise notes that we're taking as we read this section. Again, in the second major section, we have a kind of similar situation: how new is new pansori? We might want to rephrase this, you know, this is a kind of clever way of putting it, but we should understand even from reading that heading that what we're talking about is the history of something that is called. new pansori right.

And as we'll learn as we read this section, this is I don't know if I would go so far as to call it a technical term, but it's a widely enough used term that it has a fairly precise definition, which is something that we can also determine by reading through this section. Another opportunity, as you're kind of previewing these sections and subsections, is to think about how they relate to one another, and you can see I'm kind of, you know, indicating this here in a fairly, hopefully clear way. To me, at least when I read through the subsequent sections, these all feel like they're kind of sub points to this overarching. section about really pansori in the 20th century, right? As we'll find out, this case we don't need to talk too much about developing questions about this.

I think we can see that what the author's providing here are kind of definitions of these three sort of sub-genres of new pansori: patriotic, religious, and sociopolitical. I think the more sort of compelling is the fourth part here, where we think not just about these sort of topical differences, perhaps different source material for adaptation, the kind of compositional process and creative techniques. And here, because we know that what this section is covering is new. pansori in the 20th century might want to think about this also as a kind of study of history, right? So, process and technique are these defining features of new pansori. Are they things that are consistent between new and old, or new and traditional?

How do we think about process and creative techniques in relation to this broader question we have about changes and developments in performance style over time? This is getting us about halfway through the article. It's kind of deliberately on my behalf. This is, I think, less significant to the author's argument. I think if you go through this process for the remaining sections. of this article figure out what are the sort of subtopics. What are the sort of, you know, overarching topics? Later on, I think this will help you work through the author's argument in a more sort of structural and comprehensive way. One thing I'll point out, the only thing that's slightly, it's not even misleading, it's just not signposted perhaps as clearly as other authors do.

In general, the final section of an article is going to be a, sometimes it's going to be labeled 'conclusion,' but that's not the case in this article. Nevertheless, the last labeled subsection of the article does largely serve the purpose of reiterating. the points that have been made throughout the rest of the piece and then kind of pointing to their broader significance, sort of making some hypotheses, let's say, about this. This is what we expect scholars to do in the conclusion, and this is certainly what this author is doing even if it's not like very clearly demarcated as, you know, here is my conclusion to my article. So the thing to do after you've kind of asked and answered all of these questions about the article, based on the subheadings, is then to like think back about something that the author can't tell us, right?

The author did not write this article so that I could assign it to you in this class. That's work that we need to do together. And it's work that I think is really productive to do on your own, right? To sort of take some time to reflect on what does this have to do with other things that we're doing in this class. One way to do that in this case would be to think back on the three sort of big ideas that we've introduced in our introductory module. The first two of these I think apply very clearly; I think they're still worth thinking through and maybe worth comparing with one another, right? In which cases can we see adaptation studies providing us some useful questions to ask about what's going? on in the composition and performance of these new Pansori. In what ways is it going to be useful for us to think about the sort of theory of heritage-ization? You know what happens once a cultural practice is kind of put on a pedestal, as it were, right? Sort of elevated to the status of, you know, significant national culture. And then everything that comes after, right, both the kind of maintenance and preservation efforts that then become devoted to it, but also the sort of perhaps, you know, change in the way that this is perceived and even performed in some cases. I think this is certainly incredibly relevant to on this in various. sort of direct ways right the final one I am sort of hesitant to say anything too precise about this.

Maybe the first thing I'll say is I don't know that invented tradition is necessarily the most useful concept to think about some of the ideas that come up in this unit. I think if we do want to make some connections here, perhaps the way to do it is not to really bluntly say, oh, is Pansori an invented tradition or not. I don't think we need to like take that step. But rather, one way to phrase it would be, well, let's say a very critical person wanted to make the argument that what we're looking at here is an invented tradition, right? Sort of details from the history of Pansori might they note. To make this argument, even if you don't agree with it, even if you think that it's it's kind of a flawed position, how could we kind of use this perspective to help us understand the dynamic of this, the sort of transformation of Pansori in the 20th and 21st century?

Or, you know, the inverse; like, if this is something that really seems ludicrous to even propose, it's worth, I think, kind of talking through, well, what about it means? What about it sort of makes this label or this idea not particularly useful for thinking about Pansori? And I think once we do that, if we're sort of taking into account all of the different factors from the sort of revival movements in the 60s, and on, in some of the big transformations that have occurred, even in the way that traditional Pansori is performed. I think it'll help us to approach the situation with a bit more nuance. But I do not think that this is a concept that Om has in mind when writing this article.

Whereas I think if we were to have a conversation with her and raise some of our points about adaptation and heritage, heritagization, my assumption is that these would be things that would really be, you know, directly relevant to some of the topics covered in this. article So this is all I have to say to prepare you for this reading if you haven't already I recommend now You know turning off the lecture going directly to that article having a look at it Maybe practicing some of these techniques and then returning to watch my own take on some of the things that come up in this article. All right, so let's jump into New Pansori in the 20th century, right? We're going to kind of divide this article into roughly two halves.

We know that our emphasis is going to be on those 21st century issues, but it's kind of worth reviewing some of the points that are made about this earlier phase of New Pansori. That'll help us really think about what's even more distinct or like the new developments that have occurred in the past 20 years or so. So the first of these is just a basic definition, right? What does New Pansori mean? This is a fairly technical term that refers to Pansori where the kind of script, the story that's being told, is something that was composed Námar in that something written in, let's say, 1904 might still be considered new Pansori. This is the label that's applied to it because this is something that's different from those five official pieces, right? Those five very long as full narratives but often performed in segments performed a little bit at a time. These are Pansori that don't narratively have anything to do with anything from those five official pieces. So it's a very big category, right? It represents any sort of, you know, new playwriting, new innovated performances since the 20th century. And so what we often see in these new Pansori is that they're written in response to things that are going on in the moment during which they're written. They might reflect back on earlier events.

They might also be adapting from kind of, you know, popular culture or traditional culture from earlier times. But because these are sort of conceived of as Pansori for the present; they're certainly written in response to things that are going on, you know, in the present of whoever it is that's composing. But they often happen to be adapted from other sources. So it could be the case that there are like completely original Pansori out there that are just new at all, unless I'm omitting something really major. Most of the examples the author discusses in this article are those that have some kind of inspiration, right? They might be adapted from a poem. They might be adapted from history, right? They might tell the life story of a historical person with some. kind of interesting embellishments. They might be adapted from religious texts, lots of other potential sources for new Pansori in the 20th century. Be specific, this is where the author goes into those three big categories of these kind of patriotic, religious, and socio-political categories, right? So we're talking about patriotic Pansori. The examples that are provided are often responses to the era of Japanese colonial occupation, right? So these are pieces that are often written, you know, perhaps people started thinking about this, started doing it privately during the period colonial. They're then performed and kind of celebrated after this period comes to an end, sort of commemorate the emergence of this new scenario following this kind of traumatic period of Korean history.

The sort of wrinkle here that Um raises is this question of what constitutes patriotic in the wake of the partition between North and South Korea, the sort of newly emerged conflict between two parts of the Korean Peninsula that had been, in different ways, things that would have been perceived of as patriotic in the years prior to this, all of a sudden become kind of controversial if they happen to be written by somebody from the other side of this partition. right. So this is in itself a really complex and fascinating topic, not the focus of this class today, but I do think it's worth considering that you know what is considered patriotic can change depending on historical circumstances. Of course, Um also goes through a pretty large category of what we could refer to as religious pansori.

These are both from kind of Christian and Buddhist perspectives. Most of the examples that are provided tend to focus on kind of recent figures, but we also see examples of things that might be adapted from, like I said, scripture from sort of historical stories from long ago. These are considered. new pansori because they are not part of that core group of five official pieces even though they're kind of similarly perhaps inspired by much older, you know, narrative traditions and religious traditions, and so on. So this is maybe where the becomes a bit more complex, but we're talking about you know stories that have not been performed as pansori prior to the 20th century. But a lot of these fit in this category much more conveniently, focusing on you know contemporary religious leaders and other people like that.

Then the final category are what the author labels socio-political pansori. These are pieces that offer some kind of critique of the current government that is not just reflecting on an earlier period and sort of critiquing some of the injustices of that historical period, but those that are meant to consolidate activist movements working to protest different decisions made by the government, different institutions, and to kind of help support this community of activism nationwide. So some points to consider about this, just a few ways that we might add depth to our thoughts on this section beyond just saying okay these are the topics of these new pansori. One of the maybe more argumentative points that it makes in this article is that all of these, both the patriotic and the socio-political, as well as the religious, which we might think of being sort of transcending national identity from a certain perspective.

The author argues that all of these, in some way, reflect a kind of nationalist perspective, and it's maybe worth thinking about a contrast here between, you know, patriotism and nationalism, as it's defined in the context of the. So I think there are a lot of ways to resolving this. This is one case in which the author is sort of a little bit indirect, perhaps. We can sort of put some pieces together. But one thing to consider, I would say, is that if we want to understand these as participating in nationalism, maybe what we can say that sort of unites all of them is that they're in some way an appeal to, like, a shared identity, right?

It's a way to communicate with people that might not be members of your immediate community, but with whom you think you share something that's kind of either deeper or more historical or sort of broader than just the people in your neighborhood, right? The people that you know. This is part of an effort to, like, create what we could call a national community, right? A sense of kinship, a sense of identification with the people that are you. know citizens of the same nation as you, right? This is something that doesn't necessarily emerge without effort. It's sort of built through these kinds of activities. And something that's fairly consistent in different periods of history, different places, is that one way to appeal to this sense of shared identity is to use a kind of traditional cultural form, right?

To use some form of performing art, some form of narrative tradition that sort of reminds people of history, right? It's a way of saying, you know, not only do we have something in common, even though we may not know each other, this is also something that all of us have. always had in common going way back into the past. And when it comes to things like this, this is often where we see, you know, traditions that may have historically appealed maybe only to a particular group of people or may have only been popular in a certain region all of a sudden get expanded to kind of very widespread national status. Right, I don't necessarily think this is happening with Pansori in the mid and late 20th century.

I think in fact that kind of expansion beyond a sort of limited region or limited group of people is something that we can really, as we've done in Units 1 and 2, trace back even further into the past. Nevertheless I do think that these new Pansori kind of contribute to perhaps a new sense of shared communal identity that's sort of unique to the 20th century kind of geopolitical situation. So something to consider, not the only way to think through this, but it is worth thinking about, I would say. Maybe more directly related to the theme of this module and unit is, you know, why consider this Pansori if it's not part of this kind of official corpus of five, you know, kind of canonical revered pieces?

What is it that makes them still part of the same form, still part of the same performing art style? So here, it's worth I think expanding a little. bit right. So what are we actually talking about? And I think that here is where that issue of process and creativity really helps us think about what all of these new Pansori have in common and also what they have to do with the tradition that precedes them. So very simply, we can say, well, we can call this Pansori because it involves the same basic performance conventions. We have two performers: one singer, one drummer. We have this kind of limited use of props, limited use of backdrops. But here's where we also see artists begin to play with this a little bit.

How far can we push the sort of convention of these limited things without breaking it without just making it seem like we're doing something completely different. Another sort of aspect that's transmitted that I think is a kind of defining characteristic of the form is, of course, the really intense vocal techniques, the kind of training that's required both to work out your vocal cords so that you can sustain really intense use of them for some very dramatic performances. So there's both a kind of training process that's inherited from these new performers to these new performers from the old ones, and there's also a set of like musical conventions, right? A group of rhythms, particular drum. beats particular sort of paces at which the songs unfold.

Different modes, that is, different sorts of musical styles, are used to reflect different moods that tend to be used in conventional ways. And this is a good thing to look back on the article to find good examples of. Throughout the article, M gives really examples of how composers of new pansori kind of make use of these older modes in thematically appropriate ways, right? Like, if it's this kind of character, they should be singing in this style. If it's that kind of character who's experiencing this kind of emotion, this is the style of music we should use. And then, of course just the basic overarching principle that what we see a lot of in pansori performance is this kind of alternation between recitation, sort of spoken narration, and then singing, more sort of rhythmic and melodic performance.

Another thing to note, and it's something we haven't really had the opportunity to discuss in early units, there's a wide range of narratives and emotions expressed, even within this corpus of five canonical pieces. One thing that a lot of people have noted about this form is that, across this huge variety, we tend to see a few consistent thematic and tonal interests that are present in all five. Of the canonical pieces and that creators of new pansori tend to draw on when thinking about, well, either what narratives do I want to adapt to the story or how can I adapt a. What makes a piece pansori in terms of its themes or tone? These more content-based evaluations, very basically, we can say they often involve strong emotions and dramatic performances and actions that express those emotions.

And there's again some really good examples of how action and dialogue are used to very serious, very strong emotional content in new pansori. Often, stories that have to do with suffering and hardship sort of explorations of the emotional depth that one reaches when they're experiencing a difficult situation, to put it very clinically and bluntly. Even in pansori that have kind of happy endings, you know, Shim Chong's father does regain his sight in the end. The kind of dramatic meat of the story, the sort of scenes that are often performed, are those where we find the characters kind of in the middle of a difficult situation, deciding whether to make this great sacrifice on behalf of one's parent. Things like this, the kind of dilemmas or hardships that the characters face, are often really integral to the plots of.

This is true of those five traditional ones. And this is a feature that a lot of new pansori composers, especially in the 20th century, really pick up on. We can also say that humor is also a big part of this, right? So this really interesting blend of tragedy, these sort of very serious, very sincere expressions of complex emotions, kind of juxtaposed against more sort of lighthearted, humorous, almost vulgar kind of course, in certain cases. Humor that we also see throughout this form. And something that is expressed very elegantly in the article, but a lot of sort of highfalutin literary terms here are used, and it's done very quickly. Is also to think you pansori conventions involve who is putting on the presentation. They involve the kind of technical musical features of the performance.

They involve certain themes, certain certain tones that are reached in the content. They also involve certain like literary features. And this is what we mean by rhetoric. In this case, we basically just mean language use, the use of things like different kinds of repetition, different sort of ways of phrasing a sentence that's not really common in everyday speech, but as a sort of signal of a kind of like literary or elevated register. And there are certain rhetorical features, as we call them, that are consistent. Throughout the use of pansori, but here we can also see some opportunity for innovation, right? These five traditional pieces are performed conventionally in a kind of archaic dialect; one where you know the words and the grammar itself are kind of different from how people would speak in everyday conversation.

This, you know, remains available to performers. Someone writing a new pansori might choose to write it in this archaic dialect to fit that kind of atmosphere. But one of the things that we see in 20th century pansori is a real willingness and readiness to use the language of contemporary speech to write pansori. Right, so to kind of turn away from this archaic dialect and use vocabulary and phrases that are popular in everyday life. And, of course, this is something that changes very quickly. Right, so a new pansori written in the 1950s is going to use slang appropriate to that period, while one that's written today might reflect an almost sort of jarringly contemporary use of language. Right, so this is another thing that these creators can play with.

So, these are all things that I'm kind of taking the time to spell out so directly here because I think this really relates to our kind of overarching question in this class about, like, media. specificity in adaptation, right. So we can think about, you know, how do these features kind of both influence which sources of inspiration Pansori writers are going to choose to draw from to create their new compositions? Then also, like, let's say you're adapting a story from history, right. What parts of that story are you going to emphasize in order to make it feel more appropriate to Pansori, right? And then just going down, even to the very technical level, how are you going to translate the emotions and narrative elements, characters, plot?

How are you going to kind of translate those and adapt them into Pansori style characters. and performances and songs and so on. So this is both, I think, really interesting to think about conceptually in terms of, you know, choosing something for adaptation and thinking about what makes it appropriate. But also, on a very narrow kind of critical analysis level, how do you actually do this? How do you take a story that was written without this performing art style in mind, and how do you make it feel appropriate to the form? So a lot of this I think also applies to the second half of the article, right? In some ways, these trends continue; these sort of categories of Pansori continue to be made even later in, but we also have some new developments.

And of course, you know, when scholars divide between 20th and 21st century, we shouldn't read this as a sort of implicit argument that, you know, the moment the year, the calendar changed from 1999 to 2000 or something like this, I don't know, 2000 to 2001, depending on when we think a century begins, then all of a sudden there was some new movement. Right? Of course, these are trends that were probably beginning in the late 20th century, carrying over into the 21st. The argument is not to say like overnight everything changed, right? But this is part of what allows us to see this as a continuity, right? Of course, we can put everything that's written today into the same very big category of new Pansori that stretches all the way back to the early 20th century.

But of course, we can also say there are things happening now that weren't occurring in that earlier period. So one of the main points that the author addresses just a sort of newly expansive range of source material that might inspire new Pansori performance. These are things taken from pop culture; they might be sort of issues in contemporary society that perhaps in the past didn't really inspire that much reflection, that much literary output. But now, these kinds of matters of daily life have become the source material for new Pansori. So when I was saying, oh, everything is adapted here, if we're saying, oh, if it's just adapted from a kind of social dilemma, is this the same as adapting from a--?

I think we could say they're both sort of inspired by history, and, but there's also a kind of difference there in that sort of social dilemma that everyone's facing in contemporary society doesn't necessarily have a built-in narrative the same way that a biography of a historical figure would. Anyway, that's a kind of perhaps unnecessary tantrum. In terms of themes and tone, I think we can say that certainly the sort of emphasis on strong emotions and sort of emotional turmoil and sort of extreme depth of emotion remain part of what's addressed in 21st century Pansori. But I think from some of the examples we have, videos of, as well as those that are discussed in the article, we can see that maybe we see creators leaning more towards the kind of humorous or lighthearted side of it, right?

This is not brand new. As we pointed out, these kind of humorous elements have always been part of the performance style. But there is a sense in which, and we're kind of thinking ahead to potential arguments against these kind of newer styles, I can sort of imagine. a case in which looking back on the history of this form that's dealt with so many serious political issues in contemporary society that's addressed so many deep cultural themes, moments of historical tragedy, and I can see the possibility for critics looking at this and saying, has this kind of descended into irreverence, or even a way of using Pansori as a way of mocking Pansori, right? Of saying like, oh these kind of really dramatic elements of these older performances, there's maybe a kind of sense of ironic distance from them when you're applying those same kind of modes and rhythms to the events of a computer game, right?

I can see certainly both sides of this, right? That you can kind of help to perhaps to a younger audience the excitement of some of these themes by focusing on more contemporary material. But certainly I can see a perspective that might think of this kind of thing as sort of like trivializing the very serious issues that are dealt with in other works. So this is not exactly the shape that this debate takes, but I think we're already seeing some potential controversy here if we're thinking about this in context of other things we've addressed. So with this also comes a shift in audiences, and I've kind of already alluded to part. of this. On the one hand, just an attempt to reach new audiences of young people who perhaps are adults but were not sort of raised in a time during which pansori was kind of the main, you know, mainstream form of popular entertainment.

There's also much more sort of targeted and deliberate efforts to write new pansori that are intended specifically to entertain like young children, right? So this comes along with new sources for adaptation. We could think about the Little Prince video as one possible version of this, which is in many ways a departure from tradition, right? This is a way of saying you know it's not just these kind. of more mature stories that we can use to adapt for pansori. We can also think about pop culture, think about things that might appeal to younger audiences and kind of break from tradition in this way. But I think if we're considering, you know, why would one want to create pansori for children, we might also think about this as an effect of heritagization, right?

That all of a sudden this is something that is important to pass on to the younger generation. Of course, if this didn't happen in the past, we would maybe not have pansori to listen to today. But there's, I think, something kind of deliberate and new about this effort to say Oh, we need to specifically reach this younger audience so that they'll also get interested in this performing arts form and so that they won't be distracted only by TV and video games and all of these other media that are sort of vying for our attention in this kind of 21st century context. So, I think we can kind of see this from a few different perspectives. When it comes to the actual conventions and staging of these, I think a lot of what I've said about new pansori in the 20th century also applies here.

But what we might say there's more of going on in the 21st century is even more sort of playing with the convention saying like. okay we're not all going to wear traditional dress. We're going to sort of wear costumes that are appropriate to what we're adapting, but might still be sort of reminiscent of the costumes that one would wear in a performance. So you can see, even from a very radical kind of like, I don't know, avant-garde pop cultural Starcraft example, he's got sunglasses, he's got the long black trench coat, but he's also not sort of opening himself up to using a ton of different props, right? He's sort of keeping with this convention of just using one prop as a kind of multi-purpose, like device for gestures, for indicating different objects.

And so, and again, even though this is a piece that takes a very sort of imaginative science fiction setting adapted from a video game, we don't see this being performed on a really elaborately decorated stage with all kinds of smoke and mirrors and special effects or anything like this, right? So they're kind keeping with the feel of these conventions and sort of typical styles of the form, but maybe being a bit more creative with their interpretation of those. Speaking of that example, this really fascinating Starcraft-inspired pansori, we can consider that piece especially as part of a particular trend in, let's call it. late 20th and 21st century new pansori, which are people who not only are given this label of marginal or small-time performers, but they might actually sort of embrace this label for themselves, right?

They might, what would have in the past been considered a kind of pejorative term, saying like, oh, you're not talented. You don't have this kind of traditional training, becomes a kind of rallying call for this new style of like pop culture or sort of avant-garde, you know, outsider pansori. So, in the past, this was, you know, often used kind of derogatorily, often used, if nothing else, to just sort of indicate that someone who had not received. someone who had not received their training from one of these big schools or lineages of instruction, right? So outsider kind of makes sense as a way of translating it. But there's actually, this is getting back into the sort of history of the form.

There's another term that relates to the sort of much older concept of, if you think back to unit two, we talked about that not only did performers kind of receive their training as part of a school or lineage of instruction, they also often, in you know, the 19th century and earlier, tended to come from the same, like, hereditary class of people; you know, a limited number of families would. produce people that could then be trained as kwangdae as performers. Even back in the 19th, we saw these sort of interlopers, right? We saw, as pansori became more popular among the members of that elite class, were also like, oh, I want to not just be an audience member; I want to also learn how to sing it. And this other term, pirarikwangdae, was used for those people, right? They're not from this kind of hereditary class of people but may have found their way into a school or a lineage. This is my understanding of it. It's raised in the. So we can refer back to that to get a better sense of this. This other term, these sort of marginal or small. time performers are people who are not even part of those lineages of instruction. So it's worth asking, you know, why would somebody want to?

Well, one way might be to sort of reflect on the insularity of that tradition, right? That there's a kind of limitation of who can engage with the form. If to be like a real performer, you need to have worked your way into the good graces of an expert teacher, might also be something that is a way of expanding the appeal by saying, you know, in order to participate in this tradition. So this might be one reason to embrace the label for oneself, right? We might also think of it as a way of saying that this is you know we can translate this as Perhaps another way that we might translate it is as alternative, right? With all of the kind of implications that alternative has, or at least had, I guess at one point in like popular music, right?

This is something else. This is something different than what you're used to. And as sort of implicit critique of what we'll hear, one proponent of this position saying has become a kind of fossilized performing arts culture, right? A sort of performing arts culture that's frozen in time. What we're doing is another path. It's something different from that tradition; it might also be a way just of kind. of influencing audience expectations right. If you say, oh, I'm going to go watch a Pansori performance, if you're expecting something that comes from within this, you know, kind of elite authoritative tradition, and what you get is, in some ways, and I'm not saying this to kind of denigrate the performance, but is in some ways kind of an amateur presentation right.

It's not someone that comes from this very prestigious, like, pedigree of instructors necessarily. By saying, you know, we're not this, we're something else, it's maybe a way of helping to condition the audience and prepare them for what's going to be going on in that performance. But of course, these are just some possibilities. Some of these are addressed directly in the article; others are not. And I'm sure there are other reasons as well. And I think this is maybe something to think about, and maybe something to think about in relation to other examples that you'll address in your writing and reflection assignment for this unit.

But let's think a little bit more about some of these performers and why they're doing what they're doing. I have two really useful, and I think clear, expressions of intent from proponents of what we might identify as two sides of what the author calls the authenticity debate. First of these is from the declaration of To Oang Kwangde. These kinds of outsider or alternative performers, who I think make it pretty clear that they're doing this not to be funny or not just to amuse people, but they have a sort of real purpose behind their decision to do these kinds of performances. And I think this is articulated very directly here. So, the purpose of our league is to regain the spirit and life of Pansori as living art.

Pansori, which used to speak for the masses, is now so detached from the life of the people it has become fossilized. So, the sense of perhaps what we could call from our perspective in this class. one of the side effects of heritagization. Something gets sort of frozen in time, unable to change and therefore unable to keep up with people's everyday lives. So, in order for Pansori to be revived as a live and living art form, it is imperative that Pansori speaks about our modern time and way of life. So, this is articulating a problem. This is a form that, in their understanding of history, used to be kind of mass entertainment that appealed to. But now it has become detached from the life of the people and kind of fossilized, sort of frozen in time.

And then they articulate a solution to this problem to change it so that it can actually connect back with larger groups of people again. So I think you know there's more science to this as well, but this short excerpt really does an excellent job of getting at the heart of the problem from their perspective. But there's another side to this, right? There's another way of thinking about the issue, and we see this reflected in a kind of critique of some of these new pansori expressed by a sort of leading performer of this kind of traditional style that's connected to these lineages of instruction that stretch back into history. So from this perspective, what's being emphasized here is that these kinds of new pansori are imitations rather than proper pansori, right?

And the reason why we can call them this is because it's not just that the stories are inauthentic or different, but it relates to technique, right? The singing ability, and therefore the training and tutelage, and time that it takes to develop those skills is part of the tradition, right? It's part of the art form. And if you neglect that, you're doing something else. You're imitating it, not actually participating in the transmission. Another really interesting point that's made here is almost counter to this idea that pansori is meant to be mass entertainment that appeals to everyone right. Part of the nature of the performance, perhaps, is that it's not gonna appeal to everybody right. That these are, they can be challenging to understand, to appreciate the kind of nuances of the might require a lot of experience to be able to notice.

But all of these things are important to the identity of this art form. So there's another way of staging this critique from this perspective right. That this kind of accessible, easy to understand stuff that might be more appealing, but it's not actually pansori because it doesn't involve these things, these kind of maybe rougher edges, more unapproachable things. about the art form that might be neglected in those new performances, but which, from this perspective, are really central to the identity of the form. So I think these are two compelling sides. I think there are insightful points made by both. As I pointed out at the beginning of the lecture, our goal is not to say you know side A is correct, side B is wrong, but I think it's worth you sort of thinking through some of these implications a little bit more.

So one way that I'd like to maybe reconsider our perspective on this is really to think about what is actually being debated here. So I think it's kind of easy to perceive of this as okay the marginal performers represent something new. Those arguing against it represent something old, right? This is, I think, a very narrow and simplified way of saying what this debate is about. Let's think about this slightly differently, right? It's not about whether old traditional pansori is good or bad. Let's rephrase this one about the definition of tradition. About different ideas about what aspects of the history of this form are really those that we want to preserve and promote, with the assumption, you know, perhaps that we can't do it all, but you know, sort of hinting at perhaps a way out of this dilemma.

So when we put it this way I think the two positions begin to make a little bit more sense right. And this is part of what the author does when she sort of breaks the debate down, returning to the etymology of the word pansori itself. So this value that's expressed by those proponents of, you know, new pansori, outsider pansori, are the idea that the sort of traditional, original feature of this form was that it reached the masses. Was that it spoke about contemporary issues. It was something that was performed, you know, in the marketplace, outside, in people's houses, as part of a kind of informal communal environment that everybody could engage. with right Young and old, whichever class you were from. This used to be mainstream entertainment that could reach everybody and spoke directly to those people.

Had an ability to kind of create a community around this performing art style. So, all of a sudden, these aspects of, you know, the new performance that seemed quite radical seem kind of like departures. We can understand them, I think, of ways of, from their perspective, going back to what really matters in this tradition, right? This idea that is the author kind of connects to the first part of the word pansori. Pan meaning something like gathering place, a sort of. And our interpretation of that term in this context emphasizes the role of community in these kinds of performances. It emphasizes it's like accessibility to audiences, right? This is a key traditional component of the form. This perspective, I think, is equally persuasive, equally worthy of consideration that from another perspective, pansori is also a kind of particular set of vocal techniques, a particular set of musical styles require training to be able to replicate, right?

This is not something that anybody can just jump on the stage and do. This is a sort of living tradition. Yes, it's one that's inherited from generation to generation but it's one that takes work to achieve right. And it's one that requires participation in what we might think of as a kind of community. A way of connecting back with stories and narratives, musical styles, vocal techniques, training practices that connect you with all of those other performers before you. And then one that audiences, connoisseurs, are also able to connect with by kind of training their ability to appreciate these things, to establish some kind of relationship with that lineage, right? With what is being transmitted. And kind of to convey this, what the author of the article does is connect it to the second part of this word, right?

The singing part of it. And we can recall how Pang on the last slide making this argument about the importance of the tradition. The most important thing for her was singing, right? Vocal ability. And if this is removed from the equation, it's not real pansori, right? It's participation in this particular style of performance that has a correct way to do it, right? And we've talked about, you know, different schools, different lineages have different approaches to it. She would not disagree with us; of course, people are aware of this, but all of those are in some way kind of participating in the transmission. of this older style of training. So, I think when we put it this way, it becomes easier to see where both of these sides of the debate are coming from, right?

And for our purposes, it's not our responsibility to say who's right and who's wrong. I think we can appreciate what the two sides are arguing for and against. I think another way to do this is to think about like what's at stake, right? Why does it matter that these two positions disagree with one another? I think these are also kind of embedded in those really brief comments from both positions that we've read, right? Starting with, you know, the representative of the second example. we provided arguing for the maintenance of these kinds of lineages of instruction and the importance of technique. They might, in fact, see the kind of new pansori as a distraction, as just another piece of like new media that's going to draw people away from the real thing in the same way that, you know, cinema did in the early 20th century.

In the same way that other kinds of television shows, video games, all of these things create more ways that people are going to have their attention drawn away from this other performing arts tradition. And these new pansori can kind of steal the audience, right? On the other hand, I can also see why an advocate for these kinds of outsider new pansori might also say you know the more we only think about pansori as this kind of fossilized you know important cultural heritage that's put up here on a pedestal, the less people are going to be interested in it right? The further away it seems from what we're experiencing, the harder it is it's going to be to maybe encourage that new generation of performers.

Again, I think like very valid and meaningful things to consider in both of these, in some kind of third way, a sort of middle path perhaps I do think that such a path exists. And I think you know our example of the Little Prince pansori performer So Yoon Jang also performing, you know, traditional pansori for international audiences traveling abroad to the world and putting on productions of those older styles. We can see that there is a fairly, you know, logical outcome to this, right? The sort of nurturing of a generation of talent that has that connection to the lineage, perhaps, but are also able to see the value of, you know, expanding the audience and expanding the range of possibilities there.

But at the same time, I think, you know, and I kind of alluded to this in the beginning, it's not the case that this third way is going to please everybody, right? Because it also represents, we could call it compromise; we could call it something kind of neither side of these extremes. But you're also giving something up if that's what you choose, right? You might lose the kind of really informal, communal environment that we see in this kind of Starcraft performance. I think even though we're recognizing both are adapted from kind of contemporary new material, the Little Prince performance feels a little bit more formal. It takes place in a traditional theatrical setting. It doesn't have this kind of casual atmosphere to it. I could also see someone, you know, a kind of traditionalist.

as the case may be saying that like yes, it's good to promote this to international audiences, but this isn't really the way to cultivate like a sophisticated audience, right? We're going to increase the number of people that know a little bit about pansori, but not necessarily increase the depth of knowledge of people in a kind of smaller community. So, no easy answers to this dilemma, right? But I think thinking about all of these different positions is still something that's very much worth doing. And so on that note, let's think about our writing assignment for this unit. I'd like us to kind of continue thinking about this. authenticity debate as it applies to pansori, but also as it may apply to other issues that might occur to you when thinking through the problem. So, what I'd like you to do again, in a sort of brief informal couple of paragraphs of writing, is to first share your impression of this authenticity debate as expressed in the article.

I've given you my take in the lecture; I hope you can use this to help you express your own thoughts on it. But also note that the article itself has a few additional details that I haven't discussed. So, please, I'm not asking you just to parrot what I've said or just to kind of quote from Om's article, but think. about our two positions on this and then share your own thoughts on that. You can do this quickly; I think a couple of sentences is really enough to do that. And then the bulk of what you write, I'd like to ask you to consider another example, a parallel example from anywhere in the world, from within East Asia if you'd like, even from within Korea if you'd like, just anywhere else where you can kind of envision a similar debate occurring between not just whether tradition is good or bad, but really like what constitutes tradition, right?

What are the values that we want to reproduce when we revive or promote some kind of traditional arts or cultural practice, then I'd like you to imagine a kind of meeting between all of these people. Right? Let's say you could have one person advocating for outsider pansori, one person advocating for heritage pansori, let's call it one person arguing the kind of outsider marginal perspective on the example you've chosen, one person advocating an opposing perspective on that same tradition. If you could get all four of those people in the same room together, what could they learn from one another? What sort of new angles to this debate would that conversation help to flesh out? And so, like our other writing activities. It's very open-ended. Do as much of this as you can in your response.

If you end up focusing on, you know, one or a couple of these sort of questions or ideas over another, that's totally fine. The goal is just to sort of think through the key issues at stake in this dialectic, in this debate. Then, as for the quizzes, just keep in mind that this is the final unit of the module, which means we'll have two different quizzes to take care of before beginning the next module. The first is a short unit quiz. It will be five questions. As usual, you'll have 10 minutes to complete it. This, I'd like you to really just focus on the article I've kind of talked. Through them in my own way, I hope my lecture has helped you to understand it.

But I encourage you to return to that article if you'd like to do some review and focus again on the key ideas and arguments. Names of individual people, names of individual pieces are less important than the context they belong to. And I'll try to give you kind of brief definitions if it's necessary for me to include any of those proper nouns in my quiz questions. For the module quiz, this is going to be a significantly longer quiz. You'll have longer to complete it; 15 questions over the course of 30 minutes is going to review all three units of the same. Of them, you'll find will be very similar to questions you've already answered. So reviewing your responses to those questions is going to be helpful.

Are going to be brand new, especially those that kind of make connections between the three units in ways that aren't possible for an individual unit quiz. And keep in mind that there's also going to be a few other question formats that will be more than just choosing one single correct answer. So just make sure to read the question instructions carefully before you click and move on to the next question. But once you've done that, you will have completed the module on Pansori. and you'll be ready to move on to the next one. Thanks, everybody, and I'll see you back in the next video
